

Something for Everyone

by Angie

William looked at his stores, much depleted since Winterfest. He had a good variety of his usual additions to cookies - but not much of any one ingredient.

Perhaps if he mixed all these odds and ends together for cookies!

He was sure they would get eaten; there had never been a cookie that didn't.

William emptied the jars into a large bowl, mixed the batter with a wooden spoon, then made drop cookies and baked them.

The smell brought the children nosing around and the reaction to the small samples he gave them indicated another success.

That was easy!
