

Glass Surprise

by Angie

Vincent remembered when he first kissed Catherine's hand, the one pricked by her rose bush. It had been a precious few moments.

So when he saw the tiny glass vases sitting on cotton wool in Annabelle's sewing chamber, an idea grew.

"Sarah is experimenting with glass-blowing," the tiny seamstress told him.

Vincent told her what he wanted and she smiled.

"All easily found," she remarked, and did so.

He placed the vase at the top of his magnet collection and waited.

The reaction was gratifying; Catherine gasped when she saw it.

"I remember," she said kissing him.

